Personality

Diamond is a good tom to depend on. He is outstanding at reading others, his charisma gaining him good popularity and the ability to bring others together. He's good with words and knows just what to say to get a group of cats going and motivated. He is also very hardworking, focusing time and energy into perfecting what he loves to do. He never gives up, aiming to be a good image of strength and leadership, as well as proving himself to be dependable and loved. He's got a little bit of a lovey side, loving anything related to affection both romantic and platonic, though.. It's not hard to get him all excited when he sees a little bit of love going around. He wants to fall in love himself, and see the joys of having someone by his side.

He can be a bit smug, though, giving himself a bit of an ego and a lot of self-confidence. He is always visibly pleased when he's right about something, and will sometimes brag about it. He never fails to have a look of confidence, even going as far as puffing out his chest when he wins an argument or gets praised for being correct. He also likes to tease and fool around, letting complimentary words slip to flatter other cats. He's a little casanova, enjoying sparing a little time just to talk to someone who is impressed by him. It doesn't help that he's quite the active cat, exercising his mind and body to keep in shape. He has energy to spare and almost never slacks off no matter how tired he gets.

Diamond does get overworked very easily. He's always determined to be better than he was before, working hard until his body is struggling to keep up. He worries others with his determination, often needing to be held back in order to spare himself. He doesn't let himself or others believe that he's not okay. He holds in any emotions he has, telling himself that he can be strong without having to change his pace. He can also become a little annoying with his antics and stopping to talk and flirt. His charisma is often too good for him, in a way that sometimes despite being correct, the way he displays himself is a quick way to seem annoying.

History

Diamond was the firstborn son of Rosetta and Collin. His siblings were Garnet, Opal, Jasper, and Obsidian. He had very little memory of what his birth parents were like, having been found in the snow by Harbor and Lycanthrope.

He didn't remember much before he was brought to the Bone Colony, but he didn't really want to remember. Growing up surrounded by these good cats, and being adopted by the leaders? He felt very lucky to have this life given to him.

As the oldest kitten of the litter, Diamond tried very hard to be a leader. He didn't care what his siblings were like, all of them were perfect to him, and he loved cheering them on all the time.

Garnet was one of the easiest siblings he could get along with, though he was still thrown off by how quiet his brother could sometimes be. He made sure to establish a closeness with Garnet, knowing he had a tendency to hide how he's feeling and let his emotions get the best of him.

He also got along really well with Opal. He adored her and how innocent and excitable she was. It wasn't hard for him to fall for her love of life, and to join her when she was enjoying something.

Just like the rest of his family, Diamond supported Jasper when she came out as trans. Brother, sister, he didn't care who she was. As long as she was happy, he loved and respected her and the decisions she made. He often tried to help her find positivity, but she was rather pessimistic and he just couldn't understand the feeling.

Then there was Obsidian. He would very often try to tease her and mess around to get her to react, knowing very well how she could be. He didn't mind that she was blunt or preferred to be alone, he'd spend time with her anyway.

He loved both of his parents, but he heavily looked up to his father. Harbor was awesome to him, and a great leader. When Harbor wasn't busy, Diamond was attached to him, begging to learn the lessons of the leader and just getting to hang out as father and son.

Their cousins were also brought to visit quite often. Diamond loved all of them, as well as their parents. They weren't related by blood, but Cross and Lycanthrope were brothers enough to be part of the family. Diamond was glad to consider Cross as his uncle.

He really liked him and his family. They were always fun to be around when they visited.

While Diamond was working hard to get to know the Colony, he found himself observing behaviors and keeping in mind what everyone preferred. With Garnet's help, he was able to learn what was going on around them.

It was Garnet who told them about the fall of two Colonies, though Diamond wasn't particularly interested. As long as it didn't affect his Colony, he wasn't worried.

He did find himself having to comfort and talk with Garnet when there was news of an earthquake up north. Once again, it didn't affect the Bone Colony at all, but anyone could be nervous of a disaster.

He let Garnet vent to him, whilst also reassuring him and the rest of his siblings that he'd make sure they stayed safe. There was news of the Spire Colony declaring war on Cliffside that really got Diamond's hackles raised. Now that was too close to home. He and his siblings were defenseless, they didn't quite know how to fight yet and knowing there was fighting nearby made him worry for his family.

He started following some of the Nightwatchers around, asking them to teach him a few moves just to be able to defend.

The Changing of the Leaves wasn't really much to him. He'd never lost anyone important to him, having been too young to remember his birth parents. He was sure the rest of his siblings felt the same.. and only asked for small blessings during the Changing.

One day, one of his cousins came to see the Colony alone. It was Ash, and he was here to stay. It surprised Diamond, but he was very eager to see more of his cousin, and took the step forward to hang around with him and make sure Ash felt at home.

He also tried asking about the mask that she wore, but Garnet was quick to pull him away before he blurted out the question.

Not long after Ash joined, Diamond learned about a recent death. A cat from the nearby Ivy Colony was killed while he was alone on the territory. And from the sounds of it, the killer was still out and about.

Diamond felt a surge of desire to make sure his siblings stayed safe. He wasn't really like a lot of the Nightwatchers, but he decided now that he wanted to be one when he was old enough.

He had a softer heart, and he wasn't the strongest of cats, but he was sure that cats like Zidian and Rue would surely be able to teach him a few things that he needed to know.

Summer began to beat down on the Colony. Out of the entirety of his family, Diamond had the thinnest of fur, but that wasn't saying a lot. It was very hot for them all, and most days he spent inside the Mausoleum, staying cool on the marble.

He watched Obsidian and Garnet go out on a walk one day, glad to see them getting along, but also worrying a little. It'd been months since the Ivy cat's death and some colonies had even been founded in the area, but it was still fresh in his mind.

When they came back looking frazzled and immediately going to their father, red flags flew up in his head. He regretted asking them what was going on, but neither of them were the type to hide the truth.

They'd found a scent matching the Ivy cat's killer within the territory.

That was when Diamond knew for sure he had to train to fight. If there was a cat who wasn't afraid to kill nearby his home, then he had to be able to fight and defend his family and his Colony.
