ABOUT THIS EPISODE

The Easter Bunny has left a glittery trail of clues, and Bluey and Bingo follow them through the house with escalating excitement. Along the way, they discover things about each other, encounter a bathroom that smells terrible (thanks, Dad), and experience the full emotional spectrum of a holiday morning — anticipation, frustration, delight, and togetherness.

WHY IT MATTERS (FOR PARENTS)

Following clues, solving simple puzzles, looking carefully, asking "what's next?" — these are the exact skills your child uses when they explore their world. The episode wraps all of that in the magic of a holiday morning, which means your child's engagement is at maximum.

They're not learning about exploration. They're watching two kids do it, and itching to do it themselves. Let them. A treasure hunt where your child sets the clues — even if they make no sense — is more valuable than any hunt you design. They're practising planning, sequencing, and the joy of making someone else's face light up.

DISCUSSION QUESTIONS (FOR YOUR CHILD)

1. What was the best clue in the treasure hunt?

2. Should we make a treasure hunt? You hide the clues and I'll find them.

AFTER THE EPISODE — ACTIVITIES & EXTENSIONS

Try one of these to keep the learning going:

- Let your child set up a treasure hunt for you right now. Give them three pieces of paper and a crayon. Don't help with the clues — just follow them wherever they lead, with full commitment to being confused and delighted in equal measure.
- Hide something small somewhere in the house — a favourite toy, a treat, a note — and draw a simple picture map together of where it is. Let your child be the navigator.
- Ask: 'If the Easter Bunny left a clue just for you, where in our house would it be?' Then go check that spot together. Leave something there if you can.

Tip for parents: The clues in a four-year-old's treasure hunt will almost certainly be incomprehensible. Follow them anyway. The hunt is not the point. Watching them watch you try to figure it out — that's the point.
