Log line Do's & Don'ts

Why don't these log lines work???

- A California grad student travels to New York in search of love and respect.
- A regular guy inadvertently becomes the most sought-after lover in Lake Tahoe.
- A college coed decides to lie about everything to build herself up.
- When a werewolf estranged from his hometown returns, he is surprised by what he finds.
- Boy marries girl. Girl dumps boy for other girl. Girl wants boy back.
- When Joe cheats on his wife, he embarks on a plan to make things even by getting her to cheat on him, but is she the goodie-two-shoes she pretends to be?

- Three attractive, gorgeous college roommates vow to solve their boyfriend troubles during their senior year.
- A postman goes underground to fight terrorism in his community.
- A man and his sister organize a PTA meeting for a school they never attended and the sun finally shines on them.
- A college administrator goes on a quest to find the very first typewriter ever invented.

Log lines don't work when:

They're boring or simply uninteresting, vague or muddled:

- A California grad student travels to New York in search of love and respect.
- A college administrator goes on a quest to find the very first typewriter ever invented.
- When Joe cheats on his wife, he embarks on a plan to make things even by getting her to cheat on him, but is she the goodie-two-shoes she pretends to be?
- A postman goes underground to fight terrorism in his community.

They don't make any sense:

A man and his sister organize a PTA meeting for a school they never attended and the sun finally shines on them.

We're left hanging:

- When a werewolf estranged from his hometown returns, he is surprised by what he finds.
- A regular guy inadvertently becomes the most sought after lover in Lake Tahoe.

We ask: What are the consequences?:

A college coed decides to lie about everything to build herself up.

They betray the genre you've selected:

[Genre: Horror – Really?] A man and his sister organize a PTA meeting for a school they never attended and the sun finally shines on them.

The industry doesn't get any sense of who your protagonist is:

Joe... A man... A college administrator... A woman... A boy... A fish...

We're not sure who the protagonist is:

- Boy marries girl. Girl dumps boy for other girl. Girl wants boy back.
- Three attractive, gorgeous college roommates vow to solve their boyfriend troubles during their senior year.
- A man and his sister organize a PTA meeting for a school they never attended and the sun finally shines on them.

We're not sure what the obstacle is:

- A postman goes underground to fight terrorism in his community.

- A college coed decides to lie about everything to build herself up.

Log lines work better when:

- They grab our attention.
- We get a hint of who the protagonist is: An average Joe... A blind man... A twitchy college administrator... A mysterious woman... A one-legged boy... A cantankerous fish...
- We get a sense of forward movement (arc of your story).
- We understand the obstacle(s) your protagonist may face.
- The line is consistent with the genre.
- We understand or get who your antagonist is.

So, are these log lines a little better?

- An insecure teenager in a family of superheroes who has no powers of her own uncovers an assassination plot and must become a real hero to save her parents and the world.
- A nervous bride is recruited on her wedding day by the FBI and finds herself on the run from her groom- to-be, the FBI and a homicidal maniac who is bent on silencing her.
- A gay General struggles to cover up the details of a deadly military accident that killed his long-time lover as blackmail threatens to tear apart his life and legacy.
- A middle-aged woman in a hopeless marriage throws caution out the window when she falls in love with her daughter’s future father-in-law, four days before the wedding.
- A rookie transit cop on the verge of losing her job sets out to capture a troubled deaf teen after he steals a NYC subway train, only to discover the teen is her long lost brother.

Suggestions for “healthy” log lines:

Don’t run out of gas now!

Respect the time and effort you put into writing your screenplay.

Have fun and spend some time thinking about this.

Make several attempts and draft different versions.

Specify who the protagonist is.

Young, old, neurotic, depressed, bankrupt, stricken with cancer, clumsy, lovable, etc...

Someone does something and this happens...

Someone does something that sets something in motion and there are consequences.

Example: A career, two-bit, narcoleptic burglar finally pulls off the job of his life, but discovers his booty belongs to a Mafia king who sets out to cut him up in little pieces.

Do not write a movie trailer narrative – write a log line.

There’s a difference between advertising a movie and pitching a story.

Do not assume because you’ve written a catchy pitch that you will be contacted.

Cute and clever does not always allow room for full exploration of the log line.

Congratulate yourself on having finished a first draft of a full-length screenplay.

It doesn’t matter whether it is terrible or mediocre, if you are passionate about the idea! Get through the “homework assignment” – the first draft. Have fun sculpting the second and third drafts. It is important to complete a screenplay before you go on to the next...The Screenwriting Gods will be pleased!
