

About Me

I got my start as a storyteller at the young age of 8, when my father introduced me to the roleplaying game Dungeons & Dragons. I fell in love at once and began creating my very first world. It was a rough start, but over the next twenty-plus years, I continued to sharpen my skills, build more worlds and characters. Some fell into disarray, some survived, but one came top of them all.

Eventually, playing and running the game wasn't enough for me. I wanted to take my storytelling to a new dimension. Naturally, I chose the written word. The simple act of creating worlds, filling them with characters and lore, and sharing stories, well... It became my greatest joy. Almost an addiction, you could say.

Experience as a Storyteller

The most important thing a storyteller can have, quite simply, is experience. In this regard, you're in luck, because I've got it. A lot of it.

With ten full novels under my belt, another nearly complete, and over two million words written in my career, that's a lot of practice. Let me turn that practice into something you can use. Everything that goes into a story, whether it be lore creation, character development, or even maps, I've got you covered.

Or perhaps you're not looking for a story, but some other service? I'm also quite an experienced editor, and even better, I work fast!

All finished commissions are not intended for resale, and I receive the right to include them in my portfolio.
