Children's pretend play is often considered to be nothing more than fun. However, when making a restaurant menu or whipping up fine cuisine in the kitchen, your kids learn to solve problems creatively, improve social interactions, and expand their minds.

"Systematic research has increasingly demonstrated a series of clear benefits of children's engagement in pretend games from the ages of about two and one half through ages six or seven." - Dr. Scott Kaufman

How Pretend Play Helps Children Learn

Pretending is important in child development. Through pretend play:

- Use “grown up” vocabulary when creating imaginary foods with your child... When your child is deep in imaginative play, it is the perfect time to use complex words with your child. Don't just teach them the names of the foods or the dishes they create, work harder to integrate new vocabulary that will help expand their mind further, faster.

- Invite your child's friend over for collaborative play time... It has long been known that social interaction grows people. What could be better than your child learning how to negotiate and cooperate with others?
- Sometimes let your child play alone... Children learn much about their likes, dislikes, and interests while they experiment with their imaginative play. When an adult or friend is partnering with your child with their play food set, they can be influenced by the likes, dislikes, and interests of others. Let them find what they like for themselves, and you'll see their development sparkle.
