

Street Signs on my Walk TEXT

Walking around my neighborhood, I see street signs everywhere. Some provide me with instructions, and some alert me to beware.

At the intersection near my house, there's a street sign that says Main. It's a green rectangle with large white letters that spells out my street's name.

A few feet away is a bus stop that we use to go to town. I know if I stand by this blue square sign, the bus will surely come around.

Near my crosswalk, there's a yellow sign that's shaped like a diamond and plain to see. It shows me this is where to cross as safely as can be.

Sometimes, I see an octagon sign that is red and has white text. I know to STOP and look both ways for cars going way too fast.

I know to be cautious at railroad tracks because of the big orange sign. It's a circle with a large black X as part of its design.

Recognizing signs can keep me safe when I follow what to do. It's a smart habit I practice, and I think that you should too!
