

Good afternoon,

I saw National Security Advisor Nam's embarrassing word vomit earlier today. I merely stated in my press conference that I had serious doubts about the role of National Security Advisor and kept everything said respectful. For someone to be a national security advisor, you have to be able to have thick skin and knowledge, which I feel Nam doesn't have.

In his role, he has taken an internal spat with the media during a stressful time for this nation. And it isn't the first time. He's gone on several media blitzes in the past with members of Congress over non essential matters because of his very fragile ego. I do not know where this stems from, or why he chooses to lash out over the simplest topics, but that's what simple men do.

I would like the "National Security Advisor" to directly cite disrespectful behaviors. I'm not the one that doesn't know basic regional happenings. I had hoped you would know these things, but apparently you don't.

If you felt targeted by my words at my press conference, then maybe you should take the time to look into why I felt that way instead of feeling attacked.

All of this anger is coming from a person that could barely inform Congressional leadership of anything. All the answers I got that satisfied my questions were from the President. At no point did The National Security Advisor bring anything of substance to the conversation besides being an avid warhawk for no apparent reason.

If the National Security Advisor doesn't know basic geography of specific nations, then he shouldn't be National Security Advisor. In truth, I wasn't really taking a shot at him. Many would consider me taking a shot at the president for a poor choice.

I would have preferred someone well versed in the national security apparatus to have the role instead of some backwater hick.

If you were a friend, you wouldn't have acted in the manner you have. You can change that.

I've worked with you on several pieces of legislation and my love for God and the bible teaches me to love thy neighbor even in times of hardship.

I have no hatred or ill will towards you.
