

epiphany day

Every year, my family and I celebrate the Feast of Epiphany, which takes place on January 6. In 2006 we spent this wonderful day at home, together.

To begin with, my house was fully decorated with sparkling lights, there was a huge nativity scene, and also a colourful Christmas tree. On the huge desk there were little oranges <sup>orange peels</sup> pieces and wrappers. It looked like the camels and the three wise men were terribly hungry. On the floor there was snow and several footprints. The fire-place was on, and even right now I can remember the smell of wood and the cosy atmosphere.

<sup>Later on</sup> In addition, some neighbours came at home and played traditional songs in our spacious and brightly decorated living room. They seemed to be professional musicians! My mother and my grandmother took pictures of me and my brother. That day they told us some nice Christmas stories and we watched a wonderful and funny film called Home Alone. I also printed with my mum the nicest photos she had taken some days before when the snow "invaded" the city. I spent the most spectacular moment of the day with my family, not only opening the presents but also giving some drawings as gifts to my family.

All in all, it was a lovely day! What I liked the most about it was spending this marvellous day with my loved ones!
