

All Books Affect Students

Some teachers at school think comics are a bad influence on students. They have suggested that the school ban comic books from the school library, but I don't agree. I think their decision to ban comic books from the school library is wrong. Exactly the opposite is true. Comics are a good influence.

Teachers always think that students will read comic books in class. As a result, they will be distracted in class and unfocused on their studies. But, if students don't want to learn in class, they can play with a pen, talk to their classmates, read English or history books or do almost anything. Because they just want to have fun. The problem is not the pen or the book. The problem is that students should not be distracted or waste time in class.

There are also different illustrations in each subject textbook to help students understand the text. For example, pictures are used in English writing assignments. Students are asked to write a composition of several hundred words using illustrations and a short paragraph of writing. They can use all kinds of illustrations to develop their imagination and create articles freely. There are many interesting illustrations in liberal studies textbooks to reflect the views of different people. Compared with textbooks full of words, textbooks with illustrations are more
