NO RECORD

Personal History:

1954. Growing up in a family of eight, Joowon was the middle child and the only boy, which felt like the ultimate misfortune.

His mother, obsessed with having daughters, constantly reminded him that he didn't belong, that he was a mistake by God, and that he should have been either dead or a girl. In his early childhood, he was forced to dress like a girl. His mother wouldn't allow him to cut his hair, making him grow it out like a girl's. He had to wear dresses and skirts, talking and acting like his sisters, even though he hated it. His father was no help; he was often drunk and shouted at Joowon for being a boy and disappointing his mother. In their household, his mother ruled like a queen.

1960. In February, when Joowon was six, his family decided to move to the United States. Upon arriving, his mother suddenly treated him as if he wasn't part of the family, referring to him as a "scum boy" she had allowed to come along. She denied his very existence.

This torment went on for days, then weeks, then months. Initially, Joowon's sisters defended him, but eventually, they too sided with their mother. Their father had died back in Korea before they left, leaving Joowon to bear the full burden and torment.

By August, his mother officially threw him out of the house, leaving him homeless. Reports were made to the local orphanage about a lost Korean boy wandering the streets alone, unable to speak English. When asked for his name, Joowon never mentioned his family name, only saying "Joowon." The caretakers at the orphanage struggled to communicate with him due to the language barrier, often making him draw or illustrate on a board to express himself.

This is where he was trained to speak and understand english.

This is also where he met Sook-ju.

1964. Fortunately, the orphanage had received book donations from Asian countries. Slowly, he got used to it again; after all, it was his first language. Remarkably, he learned English much faster than Korean, even at the age of ten.

The Curse:

partial possession. After answering the call of demons, Joowon became partially possessed. The demon inside him, eager to wait until Joowon was "ripe" for full control, called itself Wonjoo. It chose a name similar to Joowon's, as it liked the name but couldn't use it directly.

This partial possession made Joowon partly immortal. When Wonjoo took over, Joowon's body gained supernatural abilities like hyper-regeneration, incredible strength and speed, and even blood manipulation. But these powers disappeared whenever Joowon was in control.

Whenever Wonjoo was in charge, Joowon's consciousness went to sleep. He had no memory of what happened during these times, leaving him with significant gaps in his recollection. Under Wonjoo's influence, the body would go on violent rampages, committing acts of brutality and carnage. Joowon, unaware of these events, struggled with the disorienting amnesia when he returned to consciousness, unable to remember anything that happened while the demon was in control.

stops growing at the age of 26. Joowon and Sook-ju are cursed to remain "26" forever.

mortalbound-immortal. They can feel pain, suffer wounds, and bleed, but they remain alive. However, they undergo a normal healing process, just like any human—except when Wonjoo is in control of Joowon's body.

The Present:

Currently, Joowon works as a full-time model, his schedule overflowing with endless photoshoots. As the years passed, he grew somewhat distant from Sook-ju, each of them pursuing their own lives. Despite this, Joowon remains unaware of Wonjoo's existence. He is, however, conscious of his memory gaps and the occasional 'accidental' sleepwalking episodes.
