We all want our dogs to be healthy, but how can we ensure they're getting adequate nutrition? Dogs are carnivores by nature, so typically most dog food has meat in it. However the quality of the ingredients and how you give your dog the food makes a huge difference. Read on to discover the five tips you can't afford to miss about pet health dog food.

Portion Control. Approximately half of dogs are overweight. This can affect their health considerably...so it's important that we watch what our dogs eat. Make sure to follow the feeding guidelines on the dog food bag. The portion will depend on your dog's weight and activity level.

Help your Dog Eat Fresh. We all know the benefits of humans eating fruits and vegetables, but what about your dog? You may be surprised that fresh fruits and veggies are good for your canine! Give him a small amount every day. The only thing you should avoid is raw onions.

Read the Dog Food Labels. When you're buying dog food, look for the best used by date (just like you would for human foods). If the dog food bag doesn't have a recognizable code, call the manufacturer and ask them to explain their code. This will help you to always make sure your dog is getting fresh food.

Be Aware of Allergies. When your dog starts itching, you may immediately think...it must be fleas! This may be the case...but you should also rule out food allergies. Some dogs are allergic to beef, milk, wheat, soy or other artificial food additives. Your vet can help you determine the specific problem with your canine.

Think Carefully about Dog Supplements. There isn't currently a standard for quality control of canine supplements. So what does this mean? If you're considering giving your dog a supplement, you may want to check out a couple consumer resources first.
