Miscellaneous Info

Once upon a time the Great House of Kilandra was a well off merchants guild who had mastered the art of scent. Their perfumes and incense were highly sought after and the recipes and techniques they use are still a well kept secret to this day. It wasn't until the Conquest came for the coast did their secondary talents come to light; their skills as assassins trained in deadly poison. For years they had been killing competition in secret to secure their standing as the perfumer merchants. When the conqueror came, Lozol Kilandra offered their services to the king in exchange for power and safety under his rule. This alliance would help spell the end for House Zakoris, as what wasn't burned to ash was swiftly taken out by the assassins of Kilandra, leaving nothing of the old house behind. Any resistance following was also monitored and quickly snuffed out by the perfumers to ensure their position.

Since then House Kilandra has carried on much the same. Their perfumes, incense, and herbs are still highly desired. Lord Jesop Kilandra seems determined to amend their cutthroat reputation as assassins under the veil, but rumors still spread of the House carrying out political assassinations at the behest of the throne, leaving behind only a sickly sweet scent at the location of the crime. Recently House Kilandra has brokered an arrangement with House Vamería; their heir Lael Kilandra is to be a consort to the Queen, further securing their position and increasing their power. The Citadel shall be filled with the scent of flowers.

The looks of House Kilandra are quite distinct as they carry the feline aspects of the panther with silky black coats, rounded ears, and long stocky tails.

While House Kilandra does not boast an ancestral weapon, as the tools of assassins are always secret and held close, they do have an ancestral keepsake that is very important to them. The hairpin of House Kilandra is ornate, detailed in gold and brandished in purple jewels. It is rumored that the hairpin was lifted off the dragon mother herself long ago. It is tradition for the Lord of the House to carry the pin on their person at all times and for the heir apparent to try and lift it off their Lord without detection. Once the heir has successfully obtained the pin they are deemed ready to learn the secrets of the house, from perfume making to the gritty underbelly the perfumers hide. The pin is then the responsibility of the heir, and they have to do what they can to keep it from being stolen from other potential heirs or the Lord themselves. This is to keep the heir's wits sharp to their death, one of Kilandra's most valued traits.
