

Read Before Judging Me Or Anyone Else

Fame get's to you... And in some way's i can see why... Most people don't like being big for the money... It's the interaction. We love people saying they like what we do. That they even admire us maybe. Just the other day someone told me i was a big part of their success, and i helped them get where they are in YouTube... That i taught him all he knows. The sense of self pride was huge... But, after a while... It get's repetitive... Everything looks the same. It builds a wall. A cut off. It becomes part of your day. A normality to wake up to a 100+ messages saying the same thing. It loses effect. You talk to those closest to you, and block out everyone else. It's not thought out. We, they... They don't mean to. It's a human instinct to shut down. This leads to the fans... And not just the fans... They loyal ones. Who follow on every network, to lose so called respect, partly unjustified. It's not fair, but it happens. We dig down, hard, and in great numbers, into famous people and say they have no respect, but in reality they cannot be blamed. All humans have limits. No one can reply to everyone... Another aspect is of course money... Money allows us to furthly gain. For with money, comes the ability to ask for things. And us, the fans, will jump at the ability to help people with fame. As our greed will want a piece of what they have... Helping them to help us. We are all guilty of it. However this emotion allows the famous to rely on the fact that we will do whatever is needed. That they can write a single Tweet, and have dozen's standing at attention. This is often abused. To the point of arrogance. Again, a human factor. Fame changes us, however little to we realize it. I call 'famous' people by their name. Because if I get to the point of talking to them, it's because I like them. I try to avoid fanboying, they are people, and just because they are famous in your world, that does not change their value or importance.

-Lex