Projected Schedule of Activities

A schedule for young children should be predictable yet flexible for individual and group needs. It must fulfill the developmental needs of children in different areas. This includes physical time with opportunities for quiet and active play, fine and gross motor activities, social time for individual and group interaction, and age-appropriate cognitive challenges and play. Open-ended play times include opportunities for children to play as individuals or with others in the areas of their choice such as puzzles and manipulatives, dramatic play, blocks, art studio, listening, and book center.
