

Reflection 6.1: Reflect on Learning

When writing the content for the Impact I Hope to Have, I intended to convey WHY this must be my mission and HOW I plan to accomplish it. Additionally, the content was written with my core values at the front: learning and excellence. I thought about how to show the lessons learned throughout my life and how that connects to my passion. I want every reader to experience a story-like feel and leave the page with hope and inspiration, knowing that realizing potential is not done through perfection but through a commitment to excellence.

I imagine people from all roles will read this story: students, parents, colleagues, and administrators. This website is already public, and a quick Google search of my name will lead anyone to this home page. I intended to address all these stakeholders in some capacity. For example, I want students to know I will always strive to help them reach their potential. In turn, parents can read about my motivation. Colleagues can consider placing trust in me as I work within my department and allow me to lead when the time comes. Administrators can think about how I fit into the school's culture and how to align our goals.

Lastly, how I have formatted the text on my website and included pictures at various stages of my journey should keep readers engaged long enough to continue scrolling.

I imagine that the core of the message, to inspire, will remain constant throughout my career. The HOW will change as I gain more experience or specialize in a sub-field of education. This message will be revised and refined over the next few decades.
