

What did it mean to have a home? It meant to have a sense of safety and comfort, of stability and reliability. Usually this was the place in which one lived — a building or a den, for example. Sometimes, this was as permanent as bedrock. A soul was born in their home, and would die there, surrounded by generations of others who shared that same home.

Home often meant family, or friends. Life companions who made living not just a task to be done, but instead one that could be enjoyed.

To Felony, it was the latter idea of family that she believed the most in. The Foundlings were always on the move, and while they had usual seasonal camps that they had established on their travelling route, locating work required a certain flexibility that made permanent residence a less viable option.

But her family would be with her as they travelled and comfortable because of it. Safety in numbers, in each other. Comfort in each other...

It had taken a lot of time and work, but home was worth every effort.
