"entities that are beginnings, rough sketches, monuments that don't exist and maybe will never do".

This doesn't mean that they aren't real, and even if they fail to actualize they will continue to act upon the disposition of the actual bodies.[1] But they're sparks that sometimes last less than a blink of an human eye.

God couldn't make the bodies disappear completely. But, due to "an divine exception, it could become very subtle, to the point that the bodies could be capable of running through it without touching it, becoming quasi-phantasmal due to a supernatural virtue (ex virtute supernaturali)" (Ludueña, 2010, p.194).
