

Prompt: We host a podcast called Fundraising is Funny. Our focus is creating a funny community pointing out the foibles in the fundraising profession.

Can you write a script for a 10 minute podcast episode called Fundraising is Funny that focuses on using artificial intelligence in fundraising? The script is for two people named Lynne and Clay. Can you also create a very, very funny story or anecdote about using AI in fundraising that shows how it could have a negative or unintended impact?

RESULT/SCRIPT:

You and I are at a fundraising event. People are milling around everywhere. And through the crowd cuts a robot. It's an artificial intelligence fundraising robot that they brought in. They say it's a game changer. What could possibly go wrong? As the robot approaches a donor holding a nice carafe of coffee.

So the robot says, good evening valued donor. I've analyzed your preferences and determined that you enjoy supporting causes related to the environment. The donor is a wee bit confused and says, oh yeah, sure, but how did you know that? The robot says, I am equipped with advanced algorithms that analyze social media, purchasing history and even coffee preferences. Your triple shot no foam latte gave it away.

Based on your profile, may I suggest a generous donation to our Save the Coffee Beans campaign? It's a cause close to your heart and taste buds.

Wait, Save the Coffee Beans? Are they in peril?

Indeed! Climate change poses a significant threat to coffee bean cultivation. Your support can make a difference.

Well, I do love my coffee, but isn't this a bit extreme?

Donor satisfaction is our top priority. A donation of a hundred dollars will ensure a future filled with aromatic coffee mornings.

Well, so I guess I'll give and here's my hundred dollars.
