Scholarly Goals

My scholarship highlights ways in which various forms of organizing enable and constrain participation and the development of voice. Past and current research projects take up this issue as it arises in a local community consensus-building process, in accounts of intercultural conflict between Chinese and American managers of Sino-American joint ventures, and in challenges of organizing on behalf of refugee resettlement. Together these projects share a concern for the creative potential of communication to work more meaningfully with socially complex situations.

My teaching helps challenge common sense understandings of communication so that students can begin to imagine a broader range of communicative choices in their everyday lives.
