

Sermon Summary: This sermon emphasizes the importance of connection and agreement in the Christian life. The pastor stresses that believers cannot be truly connected to God without also being connected to His people. He challenges the notion that one can be a lone Christian and highlights the design of God for community and mutual support. The sermon also touches on the transformative power of God in a believer's life, likening it to charging a device or upgrading a service, and encourages listeners to give God full access to their lives for positive change.

Key Points:

- God designed humans for connection, both with Him and with others
- True Christianity involves being connected to God's people, not just individually to God
- The church has a responsibility to care for the community, regardless of political affiliations
- God wants to transform believers' lives, but requires permission to access all areas
- Struggling alone is costlier than allowing God to fix broken areas of life

Scripture Reference:

- Ephesians 4:11-16
- Genesis 1:1, 2:7, 2:18
- John 15:5

Stories:

- The pastor's experience with his daughter teaching a packed children's church class
- The story of the pastor's mother making a banana and mayonnaise sandwich, illustrating how what's normal to some may seem strange to others
- The anecdote about upgrading his father's internet service, which ended up costing less for better service, as an analogy for allowing God to improve one's life
