

I love everything about Yohane...the way she does things, the way she says them, the way she impacts the other members of Aqours. Her story is one of finding herself, and while she figures it out, I want to be there for her and let her know that she's perfect no matter what.

Although she doesn't seem like it due to the confidence boost being a fallen angel gives her, she's a very anxious girl, wanting to find her place in the world and please others. She also has a great deal of knowledge on superstitious matters, as well as religious ones. Since she's plagued with terrible luck, she takes the knowledge of her religious beliefs and tells people that she's a fallen angel. Once she does that, that's where her bursts of energy and confidence come in.

It may seem like an act or a facade to most people, but that's the type of person she says she is. Throughout her first year at Uranohoshi, she expresses her insecurity about this, knowing that other people were going to find it unusual or socially unacceptable. She tries to be "normal" in front of them, but it soon falls flat once she finds a chance to show her true colors.

Because her true self has a different name, she wants people to call her by Yohane. However, she's also accepted people calling her by Yoshiko because she knows some people won't understand it. On a more positive note, it's adorable how she finds dark and gothic things enjoyable. She and her aesthetic are definitely perfect for Halloween!

In general, Yohane is endearing to me because she's trying hard to be comfortable with her true self, even when people find it strange or unacceptable.

I feel like I greatly relate with her situation.

I understand what it's like to find your true self and have a hard time being comfortable with it even when people mock you or dislike you for it. I also understand struggling with immense bad luck and trying to power through it however I can. On a less serious note, I do also enjoy dark and gothic things, even going as far as calling them cute and wanting to immerse myself in those things on a year-round basis. People who have talked to me for at least a while know that I think about those things, along with Halloween, all year-round, almost every day. I also have experience with wanting a different name and still having people call me by my birth name. Because of Yohane's situation and my situation, I'm always cheering her on. Whether she's enjoying some food at Hakodate or having a blast with the rest of Aqours, as long as she's happy, I'm incredibly happy in return. When she's upset or embarrassed, I understand her feelings and want things to get better for her as soon as possible. Sometimes, I end up treating her like a real person...but that's because she's been there for me like a real person.

Back in late 2017 when I was almost alone, she was there for me.

The last few episodes of season 2 still had to air, and I watched the rest of the anime on my own as it aired. Although I still loved Mari and paid close attention to her the whole time, I put great focus on Yohane. I wanted to see her feel comfortable in her own skin...to see her metaphorical wings grow. Even if I didn't think things would improve for me, I wanted it to improve for her with all my might. Eventually, I did find new communities to interact with, and eventually, Yohane did find her place in Aqours and became comfortable enough with her own identity to show it to the fans of Aqours.

Overall, I love Yohane very much and want to see her as happy as conceivably possible.

Although I know she isn't a real person like my brain likes to think she is, I wish her the best birthday- wherever she goes, whatever she does.
