#ctwitzc was crazy. Though doing something 6 times a day is usually difficult for me, that scheduler tool on hootsuite saved my life. As it became interesting (people retweeting and TZTing), I noticed it becoming more of a distraction during my day. I usually never care about what celebrities and other public figures say until I had to TZT them, I still don't care what they say. CTWITZC was fun and exciting, and added another dimension to twitter that I never expected, but twitter in general to me is just alright. A favorite was hsh2long, disliked anything that involved calling other people out.

#ctwitzc was really amusing. It was a lot of fun (though I know all my friends who weren't involved were really really confused about what happened to my twitter for that week). It was fun to tweet back and forth with other people in the class who knew what was going on. I did feel fairly silly when it came to posting some of the different "diseases." I think some of my favorites to write in were fuddsdisease, CAPSLOCK STUCK, and hsh2long. I found it really awkward to have to retweet celebrities or other news sources and to ctwitzc them. I thought that was especially hard because it was all during the Boston bombing, and those news updates were something I would never want to touch to ctwitzc or joke about (just bad timing for having to retweet news and such).

- Hey coach, the storify still would not let me retrieve my tweets from Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday (it wouldn't go that far). Here is the url to my twitter so you can at least see I did do them. <https://twitter.com/PainTrain02>

Twitter was an interesting experience. I don't really care for social medias, but it was fun nonetheless to play the game. It helped fueled my creativity since the different twitweases were...strange, and it helped me understand a new way to interact with different people from all facets of the world. It also made me tag celebrities in my posts, which I would have never done on my own because of my own embarrassment. I managed to do it here however, so the experience made me break my comfort level, and though I will probably never use Twitter again, it made me not poke fun at twitter-ers that much any more. I really like #twixtreme and #caplockstuck since I'm already a dramatic person, so this gave me an excuse to exaggerate myself even more.

#ctwitzc was an interesting twitter challenge. Pretty odd at first but I got used to it after a couple of days. I didn't want to use my personal account because then people will deem me as weird and that I need to see a social media doctor being the nerd that I'm already am. It was also pretty cool to TZT (Retweet) celebrities and random people. One of my favorite challenges was using the mashups of two different tweets especially from peeps like Nicki Minaj and Seth Meyers. Oh the joys of technology....

Sammie <http://storify.com/SammieS42823042> : Having a twitter account I actually used was pretty fun, admittedly. I liked some of the hashtags a lot, like #baconitis or #hash2long or #twixtreme. My problem with twitter has always been that I don't really have anything to say that I feel like is worthy of posting. Like who cares right? But having direction and doing specific tweets made me feel more comfortable and most of them were pretty funny, I thought. Did anyone see this?! "Feeling empirical today. Some would call it #baconitis. #ctwitzc" Get it?! Sir Francis Bacon...pretty witty stuff, I know. In all seriousness though, it was a fun experience and I really didn't mind doing all the tweets because the site that made the hash tags did a really good job.

The ctwitzc twitter project was a fun way for me to rediscover twitter. I had an account previously, but didn't really know what to do with it (and then I forgot my password). It was pretty cool finding other twitter users that posted interesting things and also have TZT'ed conversations with classmates. I might have overdone the hashtagging, but it was a creative way to convey your ideas. Some of my personal favorites are #twixtreme and #capslockstuck, although I don't think 140 characters allowed for me to put in as many punctuation marks as I would have liked. I did find it a little challenging to do TZT tweets because it requires some hunting around for good tweets to use, but I definitely got to explore other twitter accounts because of it. Overall, this was a fun experience that got our creative juices going and also taught us a social media skill that we will be likely to use again.

The twitter experience was rather interesting. Personally, I only had a twitter account to be the face of athletics and never used it. I do not exactly like to tell people what I am doing or where I am because there are some odd people out there that will use that for their own behalf. But I did see some rather interesting tweets regarding things around me that I was not aware of. When I was in Texas, I was tweeting at the swim meet and every single one of my teammates were wondering what on earth I was doing and I could not really explain it to them besides telling them it was an assignment I had to complete for class. I found a lot of the twitter trends difficult to follow because I do not use twitter often but to see people merge two tweets together for the #mashup tweets were very interesting and clever. Although this activity did not strike my fancy, I found it very interesting.

I thought the Twitter experience was interesting. My little sister has been trying to get me to join Twitter for the past year or so and this was my trial run. Tweeting six times a day was the most difficult part because it's easy to forget. It was fun tweeting to other people and sending short silly messages to each other. CTWITZC was fun to do. My favorite one was capslockstuck and hsh2long! It was fun retweeting celebrities and I really wonder if they read it and what they thought about it. Overall, it was a fun, creative experience being part of the netprov, but I'm not sure whether or not I will continue tweeting. It is such a huge distraction to me since you can surf around and look at people's twitter nonstop unlike Facebook where it's only people you know.

I think the tweeting idea was a lot of fun because it was different. It was pretty funny because I was tweeting in the library and I plugged my nose to hear how I would sound and my roommate who was sitting next to me looked so confused as to what I was doing. The ideas for what we were doing with the tweets are things I would have never come up with, super creative.

Never having used Twitter before, I found the "ctwitzc project" to be not only rewarding but very revealing. I am an active Facebook user for personal and business use. So, I went into the project questioning why I would ever need a social network such as Twitter: "What could this thing really do for me that Facebook can't?" But, by the end of the week, I came to find the platform incredibly useful. I would describe it in three words: fast, effective, and uniform. And, the way this certain project went about having us use Twitter was also very unique, fun and uncomplicated. I definitely enjoyed it.

Dialga:

Prior to this assignment, I had never used Twitter before. Even though I still think Twitter is overrated, the Twitter project turned out to be pretty entertaining. Twitter allowed me to be as original as I wanted in my tweets, whether that may be WRITING WITH LOTS OF EMOTION! or pretending to be sick. It was also cool to look up some of my favorite athletes and celebrities to see what is going on in their lives. Twitter is a huge part of social media today and it was good to finally learn the in's and out's of the platform.

Hoo'se:

#ctwitzc was definitely an interesting experience. It was my first time ever using Twitter so it was a completely new experience. I've always thought Twitter was a place where people posted rather uninteresting facts about what they are currently doing or just being plain silly. Nonetheless, I did think it was great and hilarious to find other people in class posting some "interesting things" and showing their creative side. My personal favorite was #baconitis since many people started out with a serious subject and ended with the idea of bacon; Sort of felt like I was trolling during this whole entire Twitter, but it was definitely a worthwhile experience.
