

The world was not kind to them, to any member of the RFA. Located on the second day of another story, Jihyun collapses under the weighty secret of magenta and Rika. That exhaustion led Jihyun to confess what was happening in that place, but he only confessed it to the person he trusted most, Jumin. His best friend was always the most rational, the one who avoided being guided by his emotions when it came to important decisions. He was his pillar of support when he confessed the truth, the whole truth. He told him about Rika, not emphasizing what she was now, but explaining that she was suffering a lot, that she created a cult, that the problem got out of his hands and needed help, his help.

Jumin was disappointed and angry; such a big lie, especially one based on a crime that could hurt so many people, and with that in mind, he decided to help his friend, thinking of Jihyun, Rika, and the innocent people who could get hurt.

V not only confessed about Rika, he also spoke about the Choi twins, explaining to Jumin that he saw the one he should have been protecting, hurt and manipulated by Rika. That was a second direct blow to Jumin, even more enraged than before. He worked tirelessly to have everything ready to eliminate Magenta and that politician who had hurt someone from the RFA so much.

Jumin pressured—almost forced—V to tell Saeyoung the truth. He insisted Saeyoung had every right to know, and that Jumin wouldn't interfere; it had to be V, and only V, who told Saeyoung the absolute truth. Knowing he had no other choice, V confessed what was happening to Saeyoung, who, quite rightly, reacted aggressively, even resorting to physical violence against V. Vanderwood and one of Jumin's security guards, who was with V, intervened. Because of this, Saeyoung withdrew into his own world, ignoring the RFA and working to find a way to save his brother. He felt that all the work he had done over the years had been for nothing, because those who had promised to protect his other half had lied to his face.

Saeyoung was the lead investigator on Saeran, gathering information on V—though he disliked it, it was the only way to discover where and what had happened to his other half. V couldn't leave Saeyoung alone, so he infiltrated Magenta again, collecting data and sending the address to Jumin, who then gave it to Saeyoung. Saeyoung wasn't answering calls or checking V's emails; he only accepted Jumin's help because of his ability to get more support in this case.

Somehow, his father got involved, questioning Zen about Saeyoung and trying to extract information from V. Faced with this new conflict, Saeyoung became more aggressive, forcing Jumin to take drastic measures; a half-baked plan. They arrived with military forces; the cult was too large to handle with the police. Upon reaching the castle, many believers tried to flee. Saeyoung took advantage of the chaos to search for Saeran, who was clearly unhappy to see him again. Seeing his brother's aggressive behavior and threats, he had no choice but to tranquilize him. With Vanderwood's help, the three of them escaped from everyone's sight.
