3. TEACHING EXPERIENCE

a. Instructor of Record – Undergraduate and Graduate Instruction, Montana State University

Fall 2024	Studies in Critical Theory (ENGL 510) This graduate-level course provides a survey of foundational theoretical frameworks relevant to both the social sciences and the humanities. As such, the purpose of this course is to meet the potentially divergent needs of MAEE and MAE students by creating learning experiences meant to operate at the nexus of our program by reading primary sources together and then assigning additional readings geared toward students' programmatic expectations as well as their unique interests related to their burgeoning lines of inquiry that undergirds their professional paper/thesis work.
Fall 2023, Summer 2024/25	College Writing II (WRIT 201) This undergraduate writing course focuses heavily on developing critical thinking/reading skills, identifying systems of thought, structure, content, and design in writing in students' major fields, and putting that information to use. The semester is focused around three major questions: 1) What is genre and how does one choose appropriate genres given different rhetorical situations? 2) How do discourse communities within specific professional domains effectively communicate with one another? and 3) How might does one effectively use informational, entertainment, and persuasive genres to communicate ideas?
Fall 2022	Introduction to Research Methods (ENGL 561) This graduate-level online class provides students with an overview of the prevalent and possible research methodologies used within the field of English. Course readings and activities support the understanding of various qualitative methods, while exposing students to scholarship in order to become critical readers of current qualitative educational research. Components of this course focus on designing a study, navigating the ethics of data collection and human subjects approval processes, and supporting students in crafting a rigorous research project.
Spring 2022	Special Topics: Technology, Youth Culture, & Digital Literacies (ENT 491) Description: This discussion-based course engages English teaching majors as well as students interested in digital rhetoric in exploring the online practices of youth, both past and present and considers how digital communities impacts both the performativity of adolescence and young adulthood and the literacies needed to participate in such networked publics.

WILLIAM J. FASSBENDER
CURRICULUM VITAE

Foundations of English Education (ENGL 560)

Description: This graduate level online course is geared toward secondary English teachers with the intent of discussing the issues related to the field of English education and establishing shared values for teaching reading, writing, listening, speaking, and viewing in modern school ecologies. A focus of the course is working in Professional Learning Communities in order to begin developing possible lines of inquiry for future research projects.

Summer 2021/22

Literature for Children and Adolescents (LIT 382)

Description: This undergraduate course immerses readers in a survey of contemporary children's, middle grades, and young adult texts. Students read both as literary readers exploring texts for meaning and connection and as preservice secondary English teachers who read with particular students and instructional goals in mind. Students consider important issues related to growing up as they read and respond to literature, either through written essays or lesson plans.

Spring 2021/22/23/24 Teaching Reading and Literature in Secondary Schools (ENT 445)

Description: This courses centers on teaching reading and literature to/with/for youth in schools. Students work together to think about instructional moves and participant structures that allow us to engage in teaching reading and teaching literature, both distinctly and together. Through the semester, students develop philosophies for designing curriculum that centers students' interests, skills, and experiences.

Spring 2021/23/24

Introduction to English Education (ENT 201)

Description: This course functions as an entry into the field of English Education, the profession of secondary English teaching, including exploration of professional networks and resources, and the English education program at MSU. Students read articles and practitioner texts while engaging in small groups to respond to questions such as what is English? How has it come to be? What are the various (and often competing) goals/purposes of teaching English in the U.S.?

Fall 2020

Issues in English Education: Research Capstone (ENT 461R)

Description: This course focuses on the process of reading and writing research centered on English pedagogy. Activities help students participate as professional, pre-service teacher scholars as well as collaborative colleagues. Working in collaboration with the MSU Writing Center allows supports students in the varied levels of the writing process, while facilitating opportunities for receiving regular feedback in a trusted community of teacher-scholars.

Fall 2020/21/22/23/24 Secondary English Curriculum (ENT 237)

Description: The focus of this course revolves around identifying the specialized content that undergirds secondary English curriculum. In addition to helping students develop content knowledge, this course is to help students begin to develop their research skills in English Education.

WILLIAM J. FASSBENDER
CURRICULUM VITAE

The first half of the course focuses on Critical Pedagogy of Place, exploring the potential benefits of place-based education and teaching secondary English as an act of social justice. Students then apply concepts through the creation of units that tie in pedagogical approaches discussed throughout the semester.
