The Methods section of a research paper or report should provide a detailed practical explanation of what was done. It should contain enough information for readers to understand how the data was obtained, coded, and analyzed. Avoid giving too much conceptual explanation about a particular method, approach, or research type. Instead, focus on explaining how the research was practically conducted. This section is also an opportunity for the authors to explain their reasons for choosing a specific theoretical framework for their research, if necessary.

Result and Discussion

A clear, organized, and brief summary of the outcome, including primary and secondary findings, should be presented. This should be followed by a thorough analysis using appropriate theoretical frameworks or perspectives drawn from relevant previous research in the widest possible context.
