5. Being picked last. Being the wrong gender and not getting to play sports because school cutbacks removed funding from every female team. Being relegated to keeping time at the score table with the weird kids. These are the roots of refs. Some people would give up and go on to do other things. Not referees. They analyze the situation and look to who everyone answers to. They go to where the real power lies: refereeing.

For Michele “Bucket” Haas and Rob “BermingJAM” Birmingham, life as a ref was good. The tables had turned and they were the ones who told the players what to do. Unfortunately, the world of refereeing would consume them both.

Bucket’s fall from grace came when she became involved with underground koala fighting, popular among pong referees for their soft fur coats and Australian heritage. However, it was soon discovered that koalas aren’t interested in fighting, and instead sleep 19 hours per day and spend the other five hours eating eucalyptus leaves. Having invested all of her money in the fighting ring (she expected a superb RoI), Bucket was unable to pay her referee dues and lost her license to ref, which was required of all pong arbiters.

She soon found herself turning cups for money. Unable to sustain herself with this lesser sport and with nowhere else to go, she realized she would have to resort to the shameful act of officiating underground beer pong games. This, however, would lead her on a path to redemption. Enter BermingJAM.

BermingJAM’s stripes were removed shortly after the Tim Donaghy betting scandal. Donaghy's corruption sent ripples through not just the NBA referee community, but through every sports community, especially beer pong. Unlike the NBA, in which Stern assured the public that Donaghy was an isolated incident, professional beer pong leagues went to the other extreme and found it much easier to wipe the slate clean and fire everyone. BermingJAM began refereeing underground beer pong games to and soon met Bucket.

Due to the lack of respect shown to refs in the circuit (Ron Artest isn't the only one to have liquid thrown on him), BermingJAM decided to show those chumps what's up and formed Revenge of the Refs with Bucket to give players a taste of that sweet, sweet American lager.

Having conquered the underground circuit, the two referees realized that the last step in their quest for redemption was to take the NBA Jam Pong tournament by storm, declaring, "We're taking our talents to Wrigleyville."
