

It was the luckiest tidbit to find in the wealth of information the casino brought in. Happenstance, Koschei put it too, that passing by a conversation gave him the knowledge of a rather exciting find. An abandoned wreck on the edge of a cove somewhere, submerged halfway into the water. Fond memories of being on the water came to him the moment of hearing that, wanting to explore the wreck for himself. So that he may dredge up some older memories.

The cove wasn't too hard to find in all actuality, an hour or so walk from where the casino was located. But he couldn't complain, after all a find like this was rare. After listening in a bit more Koschei had learned that the ship had just appeared after a storm, leaving a trail of mystery in its wake. However Koschei was in it more for the memories, and treasure, rather than the actual reason it popped up.

Ruins were all that were left of the once proud ship, seen clearly when Koschei finally stumbled upon the mentioned cove. Most of the vessel was submerged underwater, while the upper parts were broken. Exposed to the elements, withering and molding due to the heat and water. Otherwise though it was perfect for exploration, or at least perfect for Koschei and for finding untouched treasure.

Koschei slunk closer to the boat, wading through to water while a childlike grin spread over his features. Excited to find perhaps a chest or two within the dilapidated structure. A perfect hole was left in the side for him to slip in, the water aiding him in the process. A few crabs and fish scattered away from his swimming form. Legs making waves and whirlpools so he could stay somewhat above water.

He dunked his head down into the water every now and again, looking around for shinies or chests he could grab. Eventually he came across the destroyed captain's quarters. Koschei paused for a moment before floating into the room, immediately spotting valuable objects along with a small chest. Golden circlets, chains of pearls, and gold coins sat scattered against the waterlogged desk and sandy bottom. The finds called to him and Koschei dunked himself down under the water, hands scooping the water away from him. Pushing down further to grab at the objects.

It was a swift procedure which left him with an armful of treasure, and a large grin on his face. The objects found would fetch a nice price amongst the consumers of his casino. But he promised himself to keep at least one of the necklaces to give to Scylla. He went to wade back out of the wreck, but paused when a flash of silver caught his eye. A heavy looking bag of silver shells was sandwiched between a dresser and one of the rotting walls. Koschei grumbled but dipped down to grab it up, careful not to drop any of the other items he held.

The bag was heavy, definitely more weight than he thought it was going to be. Yet another gift he could give to his other two friends, but he knew they would both eventually spend the coin back at the casino. Koschei shrugged off the thought, knowing they would appreciate the hefty sum of silver either way. Getting out of the ship was the easiest part of the whole adventure. He had just laid on his back and floated back through the hole, tail dragging against the sandy bottom.

Koschei sighed and stood back up once outside, nose scrunching up as he realized that he would have to walk back to the casino with his haul now. He cursed under his breath but started his trek back, at least a bit excited about sharing some of his boon with his friends.