

Is it really worth it to maintain your pool by yourself?

There's those folks who always insist on maintaining their pool themselves. They always say "you'll save huge", and "it's not that hard at all". But is that really true? How much do you actually save?

In this blogpost we'll cover

- By cleaning yourself, are you wasting time?
- At the end of the day, how much do you really save?
- Plus – Should you hire pool maintenance?

1. By cleaning yourself, are you wasting time?

Let's dive in. Normally, without issues, the average person spends 1-2 hours a week, maintaining their pool.

But, whenever those issues come up, it may take hours. Especially when you don't know the solution, you'll find yourself spending hours searching through troublefreepool.com, reddit threads and other forums, desperate to find a fix.

Lets say, every week you average 2 hours of maintenance. There's 4 weeks in a month, 12 months in a year. $2 \times 4 \times 12$, that's almost 100 hours spent per year!

Think what you can do in 100 hours, you could go on vacation, come home, throw a pool party, and still have time to spare.

2. At the end of the day, how much do you really save?

With a sacrifice of 100 hours yearly, surely the savings are huge, right? The average pool owner spends about 1200-1800 dollars a year on their pool.

Pool maintenance can range, but let's say even 200 a month. 200×12 is 2400.

That means you're saving just a couple hundred dollars for nearly 100 hours of work, and that's assuming everything goes perfect.

If you're concerned with savings, you could easily work a part time job for just a few weeks and completely blow those savings out of the water.

3. Should you hire pool maintenance

So is it worth it? The short answer is “YES”, it’s worth it to hire service.

Want to invite friends over this summer to have a good time? Hire pool maintenance.

Just imagine what you could do with 100 hours. Instead of wasting time cleaning your pool, spend those summer days having a good time with your family and friends.
