

Sienna, like many other Aqualoxes, absolutely loved flowers. However, her reason for loving them was different than most. The typical aqualox loved flowers for their beauty, their scent, or perhaps simply because they're a lovely gift to give or receive.

Sienna, of course, did appreciate these things about them, but that wasn't the main reason for her interest in flowers. In reality, before she had shifted her focus to researching Poco, she was studying to become a botanist. The way that flowers and other flora interact with the fauna of a region, making it all into a full ecosystem. These connections, and discovering them, were beautiful to her.

Spring had just begun, and as the winter frost melted, Sienna could feel herself growing nostalgic for those old times, when she would sit out in fields not hunting for Poco, but instead just staring at a flower, carefully watching as insects would pollinate it, as herbivores would munch on it, or even just watching the breeze rustle it, spreading its seeds elsewhere.

A short break from her Poco studies wouldn't hurt. It was always good to take the time to rest, as to avoid burning out. She decided that today, she would enjoy the flowers as any ordinary aqualox would - by just basking in their beauty, and not thinking too hard about all of those connections or links.

But... the second she laid down in the field, the majesty of the ecosystem made her whiskers perk up. She couldn't help it - watching the fluttering insects dance between the flowers, seeing the grass grow between the flowers in a way that probably symbiotically tangled their roots together to be hardier, and seeing them all soak up the sun... she had to watch and take in all of it.

Perhaps... there wasn't just one way to relax and enjoy nature. Perhaps, Sienna had her own special way.
