

Is it good for children to study for a year in a different country?

Learning in a different environment can be such a fulfilling experience both mentally and physically, especially for children as they are still growing and their brains are developing. Yet is it really that good for them?

A lot of teenagers love this idea. However they have to take into account their social skills, the money needed for this, and the tons of documents they will need to fill as probably the family won't be accompanying them.

They have to be aware of the local culture and existing dialects too as it can make the experience of communicating with the locals more confusing and difficult than it really is.

From my point of view, this experience is good to an extent as learning in another country is fantastic, but after coming back you will need to adapt to the studies of the country again, so maybe you should try and go when you have finished your studies.
