Lately, cats all across the country have mysteriously gone missing, and a new break in the case points to an unlikely perpetrator. News of this cat shortage has been widely circulated already, however most people are not aware of the potential suspects. While investigating this strange phenomenon, reporters came to a strange realization that every house with a cat reported missing also had a gecko. Now, geckos are not known for being particularly interested in attacking creatures so much bigger than themselves, but that doesn't make this clue any less interesting. Our reporters had a hunch that these geckos were somehow related to the disappearances of our feline companions, so they decided to run a test to see what would happen if a gecko and a cat were left in a room together. To their absolute astonishment, they found that in the geckos' natural habitat, in the vacuum of space directly between Earth and Elon Musle's home planet (which is actually a little chunkie of garbage coated in human waste), they had a habit of consuming the cat-like creatures that floated by. This habit was perfectly legal in the space vacuum, but once it was brought to Earth, it became less so. After it was confirmed that the geckos were in fact the culprits, they slowly began to leave the planet, and the police cannot find them.

Man Named Tony Dies a Tragic (Jinxed) Death

Last Tuesday, around 5 o'clock, our reporters heard a strange small child and assumed that someone had died. As of our knowledge, this person was not dead when the small child squailed. We did some digging and found out that on Tuesday at 5:68 P.M., a strange man named "Tony" suffered a tragic death. Our reporters found his death was "jinxed", as the alien that reassured the small child and did not knock on wood, therefore jinxing Tony's death. Tony used to exist in this strange place called a "tessori pool," then left for his wife's place of work, therefore metaphorically dying to all the small children. One child that was once small but is now a grande said "gasp Tony. He's... HE'S DEAD! TONY'S DEAD!?" Then the reassuring began, and the wood was not knocked on, therefore jinxing Tony's death.
