

Once upon a time there was a lamia who was about to have a baby. Her friend was looking for a midwife for her. The midwife helped her bring a baby lamia to the world. The lamia were joyful and thanked the midwife by treating her some delicious food. The midwife had never had this kind of delicacy and wanted to bring some for her family stealthily. However, she couldn't go home with it. The lamia then asked her, "Are you from here taking something that does not belong to you?" After being silent for a while, the midwife apologized and told them why she stole the food. She said, "Because the food is so tasty that I want to share it with my family. They may feel delighted. I am sorry to do so." After the lamia knew the reason, they gave some things to the midwife and let her bring back to her family. The lamia never called the midwife again and the midwife also could not find that place where the lamia lived. This incident only existed in her memory all her life.
