

Theory Today: Year 2 [2025-2026] Working Group

'Theory Today: Between Past and Present' working group aims primarily to read and discuss the diverse range of trends within contemporary theory. From Psychoanalysis to contemporary interventions within Marxism, Postcolonial thought, Media Theory, and Gender and Sexuality studies, this group will engage with recently published monographs and essays from various fields and backgrounds actively shaping the contemporary theoretical discourse.

Join us in reading closely and discussing rigorously the recent scholarship in theory. We aim to chart and better understand theorizing and thinking theory in and for our time.

=====END OF THE ACADEMIC YEAR=====

Vision for 'Theory Today'

'Theory' today stands in a position that can be described, in the language of theory itself, in more than one way. If one is a Marxist, one would call it a 'contradictory' position where, on the one hand, theory facilitates us with more and more sophisticated reading of our predicament, and, on the other hand, even with all its sophistications, it stands pretty helpless when it comes to intervening [praxis] within the social field that it itself has rigorously analyzed. If one is a Freudian, one would call it a situation of 'fetishistic disavowal,' which, in the excellent definition by Octav Mannoni, is structured as "je sais bien, mais quand-meme" [I know very well, but all the same]. If one is Derridean, one would call it a situation par-excellence of being caught in a 'double-bind'; where, on the one hand, there is an ever-fleeting 'impossible' promises which theory offers, and, on the other, the ever-narrowing domain of the commons within which theory functions, or fails to function, in inventing and experimenting with Other ways of being, Other ways of living this life. Whatever your affiliation, whatever card you carry, theory will tell you, in your chosen theoretical language, that we, the theorists, as well as their theories, are in deep crisis.

To ask an old question then: "What is to be done?" What role can a theory play in the time when "[T]he old world is dying, and the new world struggles to be born"? What is theory today, "in the time of monsters"? I would like to keep these questions suspended [as Derrida likes to say], circulating on top of our heads like blackbirds of mountains or blades of a guillotine. The theorists that we will read and who will join us for discussion all respond to this crisis; the crisis which is, first and foremost, the 'crisis of reading.' My small hope is that 'theory today' will create a community of readers who will take on the interminable task of reading and thinking that theory bestows upon, as well as demands, from us— the community to come of theory readers.

—nisarg/निसर्ग [5th Sept. 2024, India]

"In works said to be theoretical, what is worthy of this name and what is not?"—asks Derrida early on in Archive Fever, a citation to which I turn not for the sake of citing Derrida but for this quote's ability to draw our attention to how the act of calling something 'theory' is first of all an act of classification. There is also of course a second, unfortunate, valence to the quote, that of value distinction; theory as a marker of worth. But one would do well to remember that the citation occurs in a text in which the value and the worth of knowledge claims are quite radically undermined—even concepts, supposedly the very core of philosophy, give way to imprecise and open-ended impressions in Archive Fever, all that the author of that work finds himself capable of ultimately furnishing.

In convening a working group called Theory Today, we have in one sense done nothing more than played a game of classification. The 7 authors we'll be reading over the course of the year are wildly different in style, tone, and commitments, not to mention discipline, objects, and methods. Theory emerges in the act of reading them together nonetheless. Rather than try to define theory, let alone defend it or even explain the purpose of a working group such as this, I might instead just indicate the pull of the word—theory—and its ability to set itself up as the open, indefinite, and imprecise zone where things beyond classification can be read and done in its name.

- Tania

Vision: Year 2 | 2025-2026

As we sat down to co-write this vision for Theory-Today Year 2 program, we were faced with a question that was, to put it mildly, quite difficult to answer: How does one orient a project of reading theory within the times that we are living in? Crisis, we said last year, was our guiding star. We began and ended the Theory Today: Year 1 program by reflecting on the question of 'crisis'. We thought about 'crisis' in reading and the crisis that we inhabit in the humanities, and proposed that these two might, after all, not be unrelated. But this year, amidst the unfolding brutalities (cuts in funding, cuts on bodies), even the word crisis seemed to have reached its conceptual limit; becoming inadequate to encapsulate the nihilism of our times. From crisis to nihilism, what words/concepts/point de capiton are we to use? Where does one find a footing, an orientation?

To pun on Descartes, the only thing one can know amidst the rapidly changing times is that times are changing— changing monumentally, and for the worse. In such times of epochal changes, as Blanchot says somewhere, nothing remains untouched. Even our certain, or better commonsensical [a la Gramsci], knowledge comes within the grips of this change and uncertainty, making "certainty as inappropriate as uncertainty."

Through eight book discussions, two theory workshops [one on fascism and one on Hegel-Lacan] , and a keynote lecture, we want to propose that Theory Today: Year Two is a search for a 'good enough' word to orient oneself in our 'out of joint' time.
