

This is a story about a girl and a moth.

When the girl was four years old, her mother wanted to kill a spider. The girl stopped her. She thought she shouldn't kill small creatures casually, so her mother had to chase away the spider instead of killing it. The mother's friend said the wildest creatures should also be respected, and we should not hurt them. One day in the summer, the girl and her mother came to the greenhouse. The girl bought a vine with her pocket money and planned to plant it in the apartment. Soon after, the vines covered the walls. Of course, it also attracted many small species. Among the insects, the most impressive thing for the girl was a blue moth. Afterwards, the girl felt a little uncomfortable on her skin and the vine was damaged. She went online to search for the cause, and she saw the blue moth. This surprised her very much. Someone suggested that they used drugs to eliminate the insects, but before she started, the girl hesitated. She felt that she shouldn't hurt them, so she cut off the branches with insects on them with her mother, wrapped them up, put them in a jar, and took it to the desert. In the desert, the girl opened the jar containing the moths. Because the jar was airtight, the moths were a little lack of oxygen and couldn't fly away immediately. The girl waited until they all flew away before leaving. She hoped that they would work hard to survive. It can be regarded as the last sustenance for them.