The world is such a huge place. With so many places on its surface that are both habitable and inhabitable, there's plenty of options for travel. That said, because the prompt wants me to choose 1 location, I'll narrow down the choices. With all the places that are open to me, there are a few qualities that tend to sway me from wanting to travel somewhere.

One of the main disuaders for me, as well as many others, is temperature. There's a certain range that is tolerable for me, but places that are overly hot or overly cool aren't for me. While I am a fan of snow and the winter that comes with it, too much of anything is always bad for you. The same applies to heat, as although I can handle hot temperatures well, preferably I wouldn't have to put up with them. Any place hotter than my relative's home of Liberia, Africa is past the threshold of tolerance for me.

In the list of places these restrictions eliminates, I want to choose somewhere in a continent that I've never been too. The only candidate for this is Australia, still a large area. While theres no specific place in Australia that stands out to me, I would like to visit Sydney. Maybe because my little sister's name is Sydney, or maybe to cross it off a bucket list, Sydney would be my preferred next place for travel.

Besides being in Australia, Sydney has a few things going for it. The Sydney opera house is certainly a famous attraction, and from what I've heard from my friends, Australian culture seems very interesting. That said, lots of what I've heard about Australian culture has to do with "getting sh*tfaced", so that might not be a side I get to experience until I'm at least 21. Getting to visit a completely new continent as well as meet face to face with people I've talked to. Outside of seeming like a location with a nice temperature (despite the less than nice wildlife), I'd love to go to Australia to experience a new culture with old friends.