

On Monday, legislators in Oregon are considering a "Domestic Terrorism" law of the kind used to jail and harass social, racial, environmental, and climate justice activists in states across the country.

The offenses covered in House Bill 2772 are already prohibited under currently existing state and federal law; law enforcement agencies possess the tools and legal capacity to investigate and prosecute crimes against critical infrastructure and mass harm.

We don't need new laws that can be used to chill speech and intimidate activists.

Simply handing law enforcement a new law will not solve Oregon's growing issue of violent extremism. It certainly will not address the worrying levels of law enforcement sympathy towards, and membership in, right-wing violent extremist groups.

Instead of rushing to pass a new terrorism law, let's urge lawmakers to listen to Oregonians who have suffered at the hands of biased policing and police misconduct, and work to address the problem of white supremacist sympathies in law enforcement.

Don't let Oregon follow Georgia in passing an over-broad terrorism law that allows law enforcement to label non-violent protesters as domestic terrorists. Send your message today!
