Why would anyone in their right mind want an old dirty bottle?

If only that bottle could talk, Imagine that bottle saw Abraham Lincoln get shot, you would be shocked then to sit in an outhouse for almost 120 years....The history of the bottle is a very important factor Because Who made it and why they made it is just as important as the town it came from. (Towns play a very important role in collecting bottles)

Although the history is important, the color could add a whole new variation to the bottle set. Most people are attracted to the colors which commonly are, brown, blue, and aqua. A little bit more rare colors are Olive green, honey amber, cornflower blue, and teal. There are well over 20 different colors of glass. (Not only is it visually pleasing you'll never see another one)

The bottle diggers out there like me. Only collect what they dig up unless it's something extremely rare, that you would spend a lifetime looking for. (Keep in mind, some people collect it just so you can have it.)

Other than color, one of the things that makes antique bottles and glass so rare is the Crudeness and the roughness of the glass. Have you ever had a bottle that looked like somebody carved it with a knife? Well, that's called whittling. That was caused by a cold mold that the jar or bottle was blown into. (Please keep in mind that a lot of these are very situational on the glass manufacturer, the weather that the bottle was made in, and so much more.)

Collecting can also add status to you as well, you being the only person who has that antique bottle from that town or area making it one of a kind.

You can find antique bottles almost anywhere. Yard sales, thrift stores, antique malls. You can even find them in my favorite place, the ground.

In the world of bottles, some are worth thousands and some are worthless.
