- The complete list of Google Home commands so far

Summoning the Google Assistant

You can begin a conversation with the Google Home by simply saying, "OK, Google," or "Hey, Google." Summoning the Google Assistant on your phone works the same way, but your account will know to only respond on one of the devices, even if both hear you.

Conversational commands

The Google Home allows you to ask lines of questions that are connected. For instance, you could say, "Hey, Google, play 'Lose Yourself to Dance.'" Then, "OK, Google, what album is this from?" Then, "Hey, Google, play that album."

Even though you aren't using the name of the album, Google Assistant understands the context and supplies the answer.

Basic commands

- Ask for help: "OK, Google, help."
- Control the volume: "OK, Google, turn it up," "OK, Google, Louder" or "OK, Google, Turn it to 11." (Yes, the max is 11.)
- Halt an action: "OK Google, stop," "Pause" or "Be quiet."

String two commands together

Google recently enabled a new feature on Google Home which allows you to speak two consecutive commands in one sentence. For example, you can say things like, "Alexa, play Hammock on Spotify and set the volume to 10" or "Alexa, what's the weather and turn on the living room lights."

Almost any two of the above commands can be used together, but some commands will only work when phrased a specific way. To make things easier, you can use the voice shortcut feature to pair two commands using a short phrase. For instance, you could set the shortcut phrase to "Time to clean" for the longer version, "OK, Google, play Between the Buried and Me and set the volume to nine."

Your day

- Hear your daily briefing: "OK, Google, tell me about my day" or "OK, Google, good morning." (This includes a personalized greeting, info on weather, traffic, reminders, calendar entries, flight status and curated news stories.)
- Weather: "OK, Google, how's the weather today?" or "OK, Google, do I need an umbrella today?"
- Traffic: "OK, Google, what's traffic like?"
- Create a reminder: "OK, Google, remind me to [title] on [day] and [time]" or "OK, Google, remind me to [title] every day at [time]."

Making Google Home more private

Google is the master of gathering data on people who use its services, and Home is no different. Similar to Alexa, Google Home collects and analyzes your data to offer more personalized results and targeted advertisements. You can stop it from collecting quite so much, but it's hardly an airtight fix and will cause Google Home to function at less than its full potential.

Use the touch panel on top of Google Home to mute the microphone. Until reactivated, doing so stops the device from recording anything.

Use your Google account settings to pick and choose what information Google can know about you. You can also delete old search queries and commands. Navigate to the My Activity dashboard to manage everything from location services to searches to advertisements. To help sift through the cornucopia of settings, see Comparitech's tutorials on deleting Google account history and prevent Google tracking.

Refrain from linking important accounts to Google Home. Keep anything dealing with money or private information on devices that only you have access to. Google Home cannot differentiate the owner's voice from anyone else, which leaves it vulnerable to abuse.

Stay alert of the LED lights that change color when Google Home is listening. It could be triggered by accident and upload an unintentional recording. Even if you take the nuclear option and wipe the slate clean on your Google account, Google still collects some information about you. That includes service-related details about your account like which Google products you use and when, the devices you connect with, and what language you speak.

If location services are denied access, Google will simply approximate the user's location using an IP address. Note that while Google Home and Amazon Echo are both constantly listening by default, not everything you say is uploaded to the cloud. They listen in short bursts of a few seconds until the trigger phrase is spoken. Only then is any information sent to Google or Amazon servers. Otherwise, no information leaves the device.

Google shares some user information with third parties detailed in its privacy policy.
