

The Opus

It's 1:23 PM here in J Town, I've been watching the final episode(not really the final episode?) Kanye's documentary. His transition from West to Yeezy and finally being able to execute in the fashion world has brought me back to 2014. You see designing was just a passion, I never felt like it was my fence. I could always see myself going further, trying new things.

It feels like a different game for me now, 8 years ago I couldn't show people that I was more than what they saw in me. Actually there's very few people who have seen my vision. I don't think I have even allowed people to see it. It's both a good and a bad thing. Some of them could have helped me reach there. But it's okay tho.

I've been working with this absolute genius friend of mine, who I also happen to call Steve Jobs of this shit. It's been 10 months now and we're so close sharing with the world our Opus.

The most important company of my life. The funny thing is I had no idea or could even encapsulate the whole thing 8 months back. But every day that I wake up now, I can't help but visualize the impact that this company will have on the world. And as we go through it, I can't help but passively start on my next project, Branding for this company and a clothing line. This won't just be merch, it'll be its own clothing line.

I feel like I'm barely scratching the surface of things right now. I plan to create a detailed plan of everything I want to do in the next 7 years.

But for now here's where I'm at:

Designer

Computer Scientist

Entrepreneur

~~Professional Gamer~~

Fashion Designer?

Music Producer?

Interior Designer

Probably 1000 other things.

Excellence is not a "hill to climb;,"
Excellence is the next five minutes.