

Cyberjunkies 2.0: Elementals

By Sheila Kern

Chapter 10: Indoctrination

As the Get Fresh Crew prepared to go viral in the closing weeks of June, the Naval Misfits were busy preparing matrices of receptionists, movie extras, and private eyes. They would infiltrate Cyberjunkies salons. Each matrix consisted of a 7X7 array of participants plus one overseer. Most of them wound up getting on C.J. podcasts. They were all recruited using the Lanked Inn recruiting site.

They were invited to a hotel in Downtown L.A. owned by a notorious Misfit retiree. Upon registration, their smartphones were confiscated with the promise that they would be returned intact at the end of the session. They were actually infected with a Trojan Horse that Brad quickly identified as Pegasus, of Israeli origin. Keyla Camho's porn site also employed the same device to completely take over their victims' smartphones. Each group was escorted into a separate ballroom according to profession.

It would take a few weeks for Brad and the Crew to piece together the details of the indoctrination session, but the truth was something the participants shared when they realized that the sessions were total bullshit. One of the reasons for the long drawn-out revelation was the way each bit of information triggered an automated disconnect. Brad's patience during this period astounded many of the indoctrination victims, but they came to see the strength of his endurance and his adaptations as quite remarkable.

Brad had been quite open in announcing a virality event around the time we celebrate Chinese fireworks and all other things Chinese. The indoctrination sessions took place exactly six months after and before the Pagan Festival of Sol Invictus. This was probably a deliberate effort to emphasize the extraordinarily sinister and endarkened nature of the event. Participants took it all seriously at first, but quickly dropped any and all allegiance to their new employers once the criminality of the operation became apparent.

Brad's loyalty to the invaders became apparent in the way he treated them from the outset. Once he sussed out the pattern, he went into each of the invaded salons to chat up the ladies in an effort to demonstrate good will. It worked like a charm. He set the example for members of the Crew to provide assistance and counselling to the victims of the indoctrination sessions and their subsequent ball-and-chain constraints. The salon members provided support for the receptionists and underemployed extras that helped them move beyond their developmental barriers.

The invaders were surprised when Brad mentioned their true background. He used a very simple bring-in pattern to determine who was a receptionist, an extra, or a P.I. He avoided topics that would trigger a disconnect as he went through his salon database going from invader to invader. It was a process greatly assisted by the simplicity of the Misfit technology.

Brad and the Crew were civil, sympathetic, and extraordinarily supportive. The technology they used was far more powerful than Misfit technology. It became apparent that they could not possibly be the criminal racketeers the Misfits claimed them to be. There were racketeers at work, but they were attacking the Cyberjunkies Project, not participating in it. Invaders became willing participants in favor of the Project. They were happy to appear on podcasts as the Misfits paid them. It was the first step in Misfit funding of a franchise that went from a pair of trilogies and a documentary movie into the stratosphere.

The hotel would go on to be the site of the Misfit Meltdown later in July. This was featured in a variety of blog articles, podcasts, and personal memoirs. Much of the Itsee Bitsee Lady's work revolved around the meltdown and the people who participated in it. Brad's role will be published in the closing volume of this trilogy. As of this writing, Misfit bitches continue to shoot themselves in the foot as they try in vain to make life hell for Brad. A chip off of a Misfit block interfered in a court case against a criminal psychopath living across the hall from C.J. Central where podcast production is done.

The day we celebrate Chinese fireworks and all other things Chinese turned out to be a huge boon to the C.J. Project. Early on, Kiki's toy was salvaged to become a stunning commercial success. Brad discovered new techniques for vaginal stimulation that were employed with great success for purposes of enlightenment and personal growth. They also led to significant insight into male/female neural dimorphism (a geeky way of saying "difference"). Neurologists were stunned that a male nervous system could generate neural waves for female body parts. It enhanced Brad's credentials as an honorary woman. (He refers to himself as a lesbian trapped in a man's body.)

It was also the day Brad identified the Misfit Trojan Horse as Pegasus based on the way that notebook access triggered a disconnect. It has a reputation for taking total control of a smartphone. It was the most likely culprit in Misfit shenanigans. Avoiding Trojan Horse attacks was the primary motivation for the Get Fresh Crew to adopt a policy of using public library computers. This had been Brad's personal policy for other reasons, especially economical ones. During a visit to L.A., Brad "rented" a public library computer for a dollar. A commercial computer would have set him back more than that. Security is one of the reasons that flip-phones have made a big come-back.