

Author: Mati Roy | Created: 2019-09-05 | Updated: 2019-09-05

Don't tell people about cryonics

If you tell them, you could seem awkward. And they're probably already aware of it anyway, and are totally not flinching away from considering this option. Especially if someone is dying, it would be like offering expired food to someone hungry. NOT GOOD ENOUGH. And what's the probability that they sign up anyway? Don't even think too much about whether you should tell people. Heck, you're not even sign up yourself. So definitely don't bring it up, you would seem incoherent. Actually, don't even think about whether you should talk about this with people. It's just too aversive and uncomfortable.

What else is your brain rationalizing? Because it's wrong.

Good friends tell each other about cryonics.

I've never had a bad experience of bringing up cryonics to someone. And even if I had, it wouldn't outweigh the good.