

Hunting of Christians

It is necessary to have bad blood to carry out two terrorist attacks against two churches that are full of parishioners celebrating Palm Sunday. Sin is summarized by figures: 45 people died in these attacks and 140 others were injured. And it has date and place: it happened last Sunday in two Coptic churches of Cairo. The Islamic State (IS) has already claimed responsibility for both attacks. If God wills, "Insha'Allah perhaps," we may someday find the commandment of the Shariah advising these fools to act in that cruel and bloody manner with which they act. But I doubt it. I have always believed that the extremist's greatest enemy is the subversive voice that speaks to them inside his head. A voice that fills their brains with hatred and sawdust. Basically, they only lack the diagnosis that certifies the schizophrenia they suffer. As much as the authorities try to convince me that Islamic terrorism is the consequence of the West's war incursions in the Middle East, I do not believe it. This is what it always was: a holy war against the infidel.
