Quick Tip #22

Teacher Motivation

Read professional literature.

No video today - just pictures of books that I have read.

Let's say you're interested in trying genius hour. There are Myriad books out there for you. These are just the six that I've dug into.

Do you happen to teach reading or writing? For some books that could really help your class become readers, writers, and speakers - check these out.

Maybe you'd like to do something different with your grading... ROLE Reversal really got me on a roll to try no grading, and Rick Wormeli backed everything up.

Or maybe you'd like to reignite that passion for teaching. Ask other teachers what they recommend. And then see if you can borrow their books!

The next step is to create a list of professional literature that you'd like to read over the summer. I am currently reading Making Thinking Visible, and the other three in this picture are on my shelves for me to read this summer. (I always have more on my list, but I didn't want to promise too much.) Enjoy your reading! Keep motivated by reading professional literature, and finding a way to share what you've learned with others.
