

On to My Next Adventure

I'm a soccer loving, non-fiction writing, traveling kid who likes the idea of living life versus earning a living. The biggest aspect of my online presence is my HokieSports player profile. As an athlete, sports have been a huge part of my identity my whole life. Yet, it's not the only thing that I identify with. I love to write and spent time writing an opinions column for the Collegiate Times. Lastly, I love to travel. My image represents all three aspects of my life and how they can all come together into one combined passion.

The photo itself is justified a little to the right because I wanted to represent that things don't always follow a straight-forward plan. Most of my life is spent figuring out how I can do what I want without being discouraged that the normal way of getting there is not an option anymore.

The polaroid frame was chosen to represent that this is just a snapshot of my life at this moment. I don't like to plan my life too far in advance because I like to be able to go with the flow and grab opportunities that come my way unexpectedly.

Professionally, I have a LinkedIn profile and an online resume where future employers can see my past work experience and volunteer activities. For personal use I have a Twitter and a Pinterest account, but most often times they go unused. My Facebook account has been relegated to a photo album collection of my trips and where I can grab photos of me that my friends post.
