INTRODUCTION

As documentary producers we play a critical role in shaping our industry. From the creative decisions we make, to the teams we build, to how we communicate goals and priorities to funders and partners, we have the power to make choices that impact not only our films, but the whole industry. We hope this guide can help all producers and content creators better understand the responsibilities we share, internalize the importance of this work, and highlight the reasons, benefits and pathways to creating an inclusive and decolonized documentary ecosystem.

Below are a number of links containing interviews, articles, speeches and media about the lack of representation and access in visual media, journalism and literature as well as tools and guides to address it. They are meant to provide a background of the challenges facing the documentary industry and our society at large regarding inclusion, racism and colonization.

While the resources below include invaluable insights, information, and suggestions for remedies, it is of great importance to note that they exist as part of a larger context and conversation. This guide should not be taken as a substitute for personal and professional engagement with the broader movement in the documentary industry.

Finally, this is a “living document”; it will evolve and improve over time and we plan to review, edit and update it on an on-going basis. If you have suggestions for resources or articles or just want to give feedback, please do so using this feedback form.
