The wind blew through the leafless trees that littered the ground on the Frigid valley. The flora was nothing except persistent through the perilous biome of frost and starlight. Stars twinkled above, the moon hung high and proud in her perch. Snowflakes danced their way down from the heavens above, ranging from smaller than a speckle of a Dusted marking, to large and fat like the size of a Sapiere's eye. It was a lovely scene right out of a children's storybook. The only thing that brought them back was that frigid breeze that seemed to blow through bone and fur itself.

Méduse quite liked the colder air; being a creature of the ocean floor, she thrived in colder, darker climates. The Rayfin with a nautical mutation that allows her to resemble a jellyfish, floated in the air as if she were in water, the glowing bulbs of her tendrils illuminating the area around her being, making her look like an otherworldly, ethereal being. Her Celestial feline, Marina, was at her side at all times; her eels dancing around her pink and blue form.

Poltergeist, however, did not care for the colder climate, but also thrived in the dark, having been blessed by Lunaris herself, he quite liked it. He shivered with an incoming breeze and huffed through it, his breath coming out as puffy, white clouds. He didn't have an agenda for today's outing, he supposed, just to survey the area to see what lay in waiting through the snow. With a quick glance to the sky, he didn't see any impending storms, so it should be safe enough to venture out. With a nod to his counterpart in today's excursion, the two set forth.

Méduse was thrilled with the snow. Having rarely left the ocean, she was mesmerized with the sights of the land. Snow seemed to be her favorite. Every so often, a shrill, tinkling of a giggle would rumble her chest as snowflakes landed on her face. She'd get close enough to the ground to pick up a handful of snow, allowing the flakes to slip through her paws. Poltergeist grinned at her childlike wonder and huffed through a laugh. Marina, her feline, snickered and giggled in tandem, the sound mimicking Méduse's own giggle, soft and tinkling like a little bell.

The deeper through the valley they went, the more flora they found. It truly was a wonder how it managed to survive through the storms that tore through this biome. Snow clung to the trees that clung for dear life, roots entangled themselves together with other trees, creating a land of roots and rock under the ice cold ground. Méduse even gasped once she saw some glowing flowers that peeked through the snow, hidden away behind larger rocks and even behind some of the trees; anything to get them out of the path of the berating wind once the storms hit.

Méduse let out a chirping sound, catching Poltergeist's attention. He followed her gaze to a cottage that hid amongst the trees. A curious sight. Puffy, white clouds streamed from the chimney, signaling someone was inside. They looked at one another - should they go investigate, or should they just resume their adventure in the snow for a little longer? Méduse tilted her head and Poltergeist nodded in understanding. It appears the choice has been made, they would investigate the cottage and see what hidden gems it had in store. Perhaps it was uninhabited and was brought to life with magic. Perhaps there would be food on the table, or perhaps on the hearth, waiting to be eaten. Maybe, it was an elderly dragon who would delight in the company and who would tell stories of their youth, struggles and accomplishments in their life. Maybe it was a family who would be kind enough to share warmth and a meal. Only time would tell. The two made their way to the door. Poltergeist lifted his paw and knocked thrice. Marina, the feline, floated nearby, her eels chittering among one another, as if sussing out the area, determining if it were safe or not, as the feline herself tilted her head and purred loudly.
