

Domenica Vargas

English 10

March 25, 2014

Gender Inequality

The media's portrayal of women in the United States has not only affected female psychology but as well as the percent of women who pursue high status jobs. In the article "Moving Past Gender Barriers to Negotiate a Raise," our society has been exposed to the sad truth of gender inequality and all the blame goes to women in how they act or dress. This article addresses the women individually, and blames most of it on women themselves because they don't go after those high paying jobs. Of course from a male's point of view this can easily be said, it is pure bias towards the audience. As we have known throughout history, women have always been seen lower than man and because of that women have been affected in the workforce. According to The Economist Online, "SINCE 1970 the proportion of women in the workforce across the rich world has increased from 48% to 64%" (Working women: Still Struggling | The Economist). Could it be a man's concern that women some day might fully take over? Can that be a reason why man decide to put down women so poorly? However, in recognition of the low standards of businesses paying the women they point out the differences but don't discuss them. Piercy has suggested that its the women's fault that they don't go for high status jobs, that we don't pursue these positions (Moving Past Gender Barriers to Negotiate a Raise). The social media has successfully put women under man in every way possible they can think of because they humiliate them in everyday advertisements. The Social Media has portrayed images of women that have the perfect body and powdered of makeup to reach perfection; society has played a role in the insecurity of women (Moving Barriers to Negotiate a Raise). America will need more to blame than just women for this gender inequity.