

What I've learned about being a founder

Make a creative article/blog for PilotCity.com based on the contents of the below raw draft.
Make a format that creatively formats the format of the raw draft shared below that creates an engaging, short, sweet and approachable thought piece:

What I've learned about being a founder is that nothing is guaranteed.

As much as you have the confidence to do what you set out to do, it isn't certain that you will hit the mark.

Though, the act of perseverance is seemingly the only hope to achieve success.

Belief in vision is what continues the drive, and revitalizes the drive, with whats there still.

With the due diligence of constantly revisiting the foundations of common sense of the product, the market, and the experiments necessary to achieve puzzling the opportunity together is the basis for common sense confidence.

With all the time I've spent on PilotCity. I do now see the pitfalls and the critiques of the decisions I've made. This of course, is only useful if I acknowledge them and approach differently the 2nd time.

While ambition longs far, it has rubble it produces and desert lands it dries out. The question asked in reflection is, is it worth it?

The short answer is yes, so long as I agree that the sacrifice is "fixable" and the opportunity is still a belief that withstands the change of my own beliefs.

With that said, the next step is always the most important - what will I do in this particular circumstance at this moment of time? What will change that will "course correct" any missed areas of addressing the "whole picture."