

The Apostrophe

By Bill Carrigan

The apostrophe (') is used to show possession, omission, or certain plurals.*

Possession

- Add apostrophe+s to singular nouns—Jane's car, one's own, yesterday's toys, nobody's business, for pity's sake, the boss's desk, Lenz's way, Marx's theories, Malraux's works—or plural nouns not ending in an s or z sound—women's rights, men's room, children's books. (Some proper names omit the apostrophe: Harpers Ferry, Saint Johns River.)
- Certain exceptions are made for euphony or tradition: Sophocles' plays, for appearance' sake, Dickens' novels, New York Times' ads, Jesus' life, Moses' laws, Xerxes' kingdom. Let your ear guide you and be consistent.
- To plural nouns ending in an s or z sound, add only the apostrophe: two cents' worth, ladies' room, three days' time, farmers' market, Joneses' house (house of the Joneses).
- Treat closely linked nouns as a single unit: my aunt and uncle's family. But: my mother's and father's jobs.
- Use roman type for the s applied to an italicized title: the Saturday Review's fiction, the Washington Post's editorials.
- Hyphenated possessives show the s at the end: my brother-in-law's car. (Not after the first word, as in the plural brothers-in-law, passers-by.)
- Don't use the apostrophe in the pronouns his, hers, its, ours, yours, theirs, or whose. Distinguish the possessive its from the contraction it's (it is or it has).

Omission

- Use an apostrophe to mark the omission in a contraction: can't, couldn't, didn't, needn't, shouldn't, won't, she'll, he'd, who's (who is), class of '85, rock 'n' roll, etc. This applies to some omissions in dialect: 'em, 'cause, s'pose, fixin', etc. But note: gonna (going to), woulda (would have), outa (out of), etc.

Plurals

- Use an apostrophe+s to form the plural or possessive of an abbreviation with periods— Ph.D.'s, P.O.W.'s—or the plural of a single letter or symbol—dots his i's and crosses his t's, mind your p's and q's, the I's have it.
- A plural abbreviation, coinage, or number doesn't take the apostrophe if the meaning is clear: IOUs, his ABCs, her howdy-dos, the 1940s.
- Don't use an apostrophe to form the plural of a proper name: the Bushes, two mild ApriIs, ten Hail Marys; the two Dumas, Alexandre Dumas père and fils.

*In Microsoft Word, the apostrophe is found as a symbol (Insert, Symbol, General Punctuation) or as a mark on the keyboard. The keyboard result will be backward (‘) unless it immediately follows a symbol or letter. To write 'cause, 'em, etc., type the full word, insert the apostrophe, and delete the unwanted part. Can apply also to quote marks.
