In this section, we invite teachers to provide context on why they have opted to shift their classroom to be blended, self-paced, and mastery-based. Be sure to overview how this helps students!

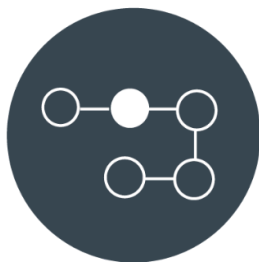

Blended Instruction

Students access content through teacher-created videos.

Self-Paced Structures

Students control the pace of their own learning.

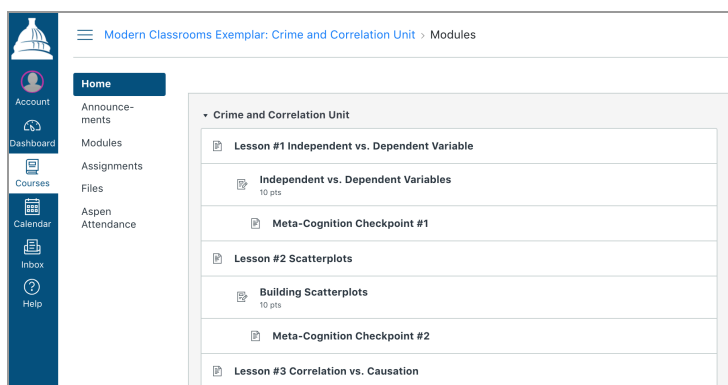

Mastery-Based Grading

Students progress from one lesson to the next when they demonstrate mastery.

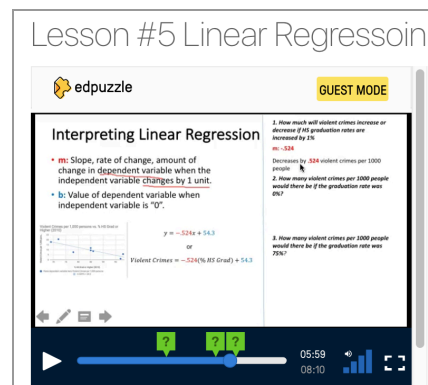

Blended Instruction: We encourage teachers to personalize this section! Here's an example: Each day, students access content that is appropriately challenging for them. I do not teach the same thing to all students on the same day. Instead, students access course content through Canvas, where they can watch instructional videos I've created for them. Students navigate through the course without my assistance, giving me the freedom to spend my entire class time working with students.

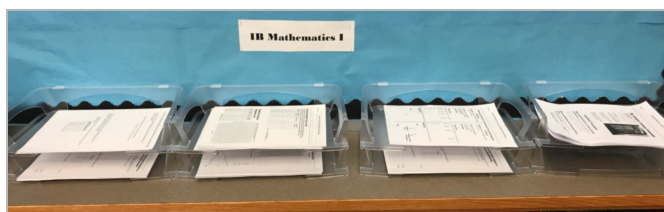

Canvas, my Learning Management System

Instructional Videos with Embedded Questions

Physical Assignments Associated with videos in Canvas

Self-Paced Structure: We encourage teachers to personalize this section! Here's an example: All students work within each unit of study at their own pace. Students' progress (never their grade) is tracked on a publicly displayed tracker, updated daily. This tracker allows students to self-direct and collaborate as they work through our unit.

Mastery-Based Learning: We encourage teachers to personalize this section! Here's an example: Students advance through content based on their understanding. Each student consistently engages in a mixture of revision, reassessment, and reflection until they achieve authentic mastery. Progress to the next lesson is contingent on mastery, not completion, of a previous lesson.
